The word "ITALY" is written in a white box on the right side of the image.

ITALY

The growing colony of lawyers under 40

The Italian legal market is undergoing a significant generational transition. Lawyers under the age of 40 now represent a clear majority of the professionals considered in this analysis, accounting for 3,168 out of 4,960 lawyers, or 63.87% of the total.

by vincenzo rozzo

This figure provides an immediate indication of the growing weight of younger professionals within the Italian legal landscape and raises an important question for the market: how is this increasingly young workforce translating into professional seniority, leadership and decision-making power? The data suggest that the presence of younger lawyers is not confined to the entry levels of the profession. On the contrary, under-40 lawyers are already a substantial component of the teams operating within Italy's leading law firms. At the same time, however, their representation at partnership level remains considerably more limited. The result is a market characterised by a relatively young professional population, alongside a leadership structure that remains predominantly more senior.

A YOUNG PROFESSION, WITH WOMEN AT THE CENTRE

The generational shift is particularly evident when looking at gender. Of the 3,168 lawyers under 40, 1,696 are women, representing 53.54% of the under-40 population. Women therefore constitute the majority of this younger cohort, confirming that the next generation of lawyers in Italy is not only larger but also increasingly female. This demographic profile has important implications for the future structure of the profession. If the current generation progresses through the ranks, the composition of the legal market — and potentially its leadership — could evolve substantially. The key issue, however, is whether the strong presence of women and younger lawyers at associate and junior levels will be reflected proportionally in positions of greater responsibility.

FROM NUMBERS TO LEADERSHIP

The gap between participation and leadership is particularly visible at partnership level. Across the population analysed, there are 989 partners, of whom only 51 are under 40, corresponding to 5.16% of the total partner population. Among these under-40 partners, women represent 23.56%, according to the data.

The figures therefore point to a clear generational pyramid: younger lawyers are already highly represented within the workforce, but only a small proportion have reached partnership. This should not necessarily be interpreted as a structural anomaly. Partnership is typically the result of a long professional progression, meaning that age naturally has a significant influence on access to senior positions. Nevertheless, the data provide an important baseline for understanding how quickly the current generation of lawyers may move into positions of leadership over the coming years.

The gender dimension adds another layer to this transition. Women account for more than half of all under-40 lawyers, yet the representation of women among under-40 partners remains considerably lower. The progression of this cohort into senior roles will therefore be an important indicator of how the Italian legal market evolves in terms of both generational and gender representation.

M&A AS A YOUNG PROFESSIONALS' STRONGHOLD

The younger generation appears particularly prominent in M&A departments, where 553 of 974 lawyers — 56.8% — are under 40. The figure highlights the strong role played by younger professionals in one of the most strategically significant and internationally oriented areas of legal practice.

The concentration of under-40 lawyers in M&A may also reflect the characteristics of the practice itself: transaction-driven work, international client exposure and multidisciplinary teams often require sizeable groups of lawyers operating across different levels of seniority. The data nevertheless show that younger lawyers constitute the majority of the M&A population considered in this analysis.

THE LEADING FIRMS AND THE SCALE OF THE YOUNGER GENERATION

The presence of under-40 lawyers is particularly striking among Italy's leading firms. Pirola Pennuto Zei & Associati has 445 lawyers under 40 out of a total of 671, followed by BonelliErede, with 406 out of 570, Chiomenti, with 355 out of 478, Legance, with 331 out of 448, and Gianni & Origoni, with 302 out of 517. Other firms with significant under-40 populations include PedersoliGattai, Deloitte Legal and LCA Studio Legale.

The figures demonstrate that the younger generation is not marginal to the leading segment of the Italian legal market. It forms a substantial part of the workforce supporting some of the country's most prominent firms and practices.

Yet the partnership figures tell a different story. Pirola Pennuto Zei & Associati leads the group with 16 partners under 40, followed by Legance with eight and BonelliErede with seven. LEXIA has six, while several other firms have one to three partners under 40. This contrast between the scale of the under-40 population and the relatively limited number of young partners is one of the defining features emerging from the data.

A MARKET AT A GENERATIONAL CROSSROADS

Taken together, the figures portray an Italian legal market at a generational crossroads. More than six out of ten lawyers in the analysed population are under 40, and women represent a majority of this younger cohort. The new generation is therefore already firmly embedded in the operational structure of the profession, particularly within major firms and high-value practices such as M&A.

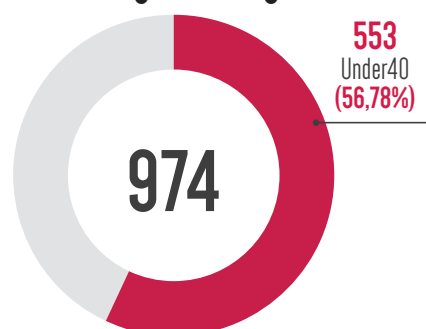

The next phase of the market's evolution will depend, in part, on how this large pool of younger professionals progresses into senior and leadership positions. The relatively small number of under-40 partners shows that this transition has only begun. For law firms, clients and the profession as a whole, the development of this generation will increasingly shape questions around leadership, talent retention, diversity and the future organisation of legal services in Italy.

This report explores that emerging generation in greater detail, examining where under-40 lawyers are concentrated, the firms and practices in which they are most strongly represented, and the extent to which today's young legal professionals are already beginning to influence the structure of tomorrow's Italian legal market.

IBERIA

The rise of the under-40 lawyer in the Iberian legal market

Lawyers under the age of 40 now represent a clear majority of the population analysed captured in this analysis, pointing to a significant generational shift across law firms in Spain and Portugal. Out of a total population of 5,749 lawyers, 3,640 are under 40, equivalent to 63% of the overall population

by vincenzo rozzo

This is more than a demographic statistic. The strong presence of younger lawyers is reshaping the profile of the Iberian legal market, from the composition of practice teams to the future pipeline of firm leadership. It also raises important questions about how firms are developing, retaining and promoting the next generation of legal professionals.

GENDER BALANCE REMAINS AN IMPORTANT DIMENSION

Women account for 1,611 of the 3,640 lawyers under 40, or 44% of the cohort. The figure provides an important additional dimension to the generational picture. The representation of women becomes particularly relevant when examining the transition from the broader lawyer population to senior positions. Of the 821 partners included in the data, 84 are under 40, representing 10% of all partners. Within this under-40 partner group, 31% are women. The figures therefore point to a distinction between representation within the younger lawyer population and representation at partnership level. Women constitute 44% of lawyers under 40, while accounting for 31% of under-40 partners. This gap provides an important area for further analysis of career progression, partnership access and the composition of future leadership in Iberian law firms.

A YOUNG PROFESSION, PARTICULARLY VISIBLE IN M&A

The concentration of younger lawyers is especially evident in transactional practices. Among the 638 lawyers identified in M&A departments, 337 are under 40, representing 53% of the total. While the proportion is slightly below the overall 63% share, the absolute size of the under-40 cohort confirms the importance of younger professionals to one of the market's most commercially driven practices.

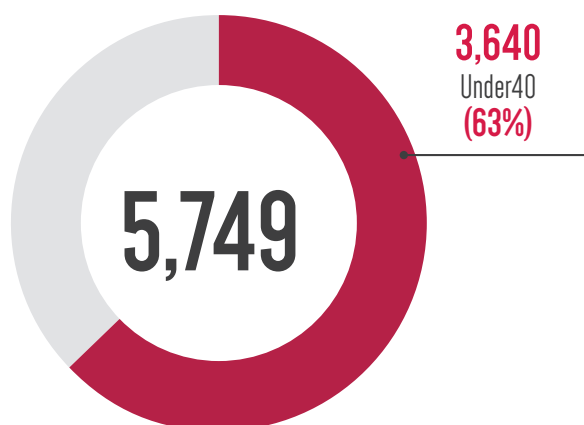

The data suggests that the under-40 generation is already deeply embedded in the teams handling some of the most significant corporate and investment activity across Iberia. Their presence is therefore not limited to the future of the profession: younger lawyers are already an important part of the market's current operating structure.

The growing cohort of lawyers under 40

M&A departments leading the charge

WHERE THE NEXT GENERATION IS CONCENTRATED

The distribution of under-40 lawyers across the leading firms also highlights the scale at which the generational shift is taking place. Among the firms included in the top 20, EY Abogados records 864 lawyers under 40, followed by KPMG Abogados with 831. Gómez-Acebo & Pombo has 250, while Ambar, EJASO and BROSETA have 170, 155 and 147 respectively.

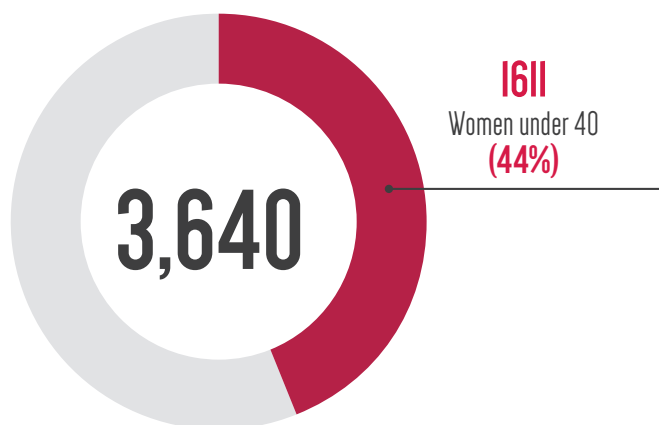

These figures demonstrate that younger lawyers are not concentrated exclusively in traditional independent law firms. Large professional-services legal practices, international firms and established Iberian firms all feature prominently in the under-40 population. The partnership data provides another perspective. EY Abogados has eight partners under 40, while EJASO and Gómez-Acebo & Pombo each have six and five respectively. Abreu Advogados also records five. Other firms in the dataset, including ZADAL and DOWER, have particularly notable proportions of their partnership represented by lawyers under 40, despite their smaller overall partner populations.

A GENERATION SHAPING THE MARKET'S FUTURE

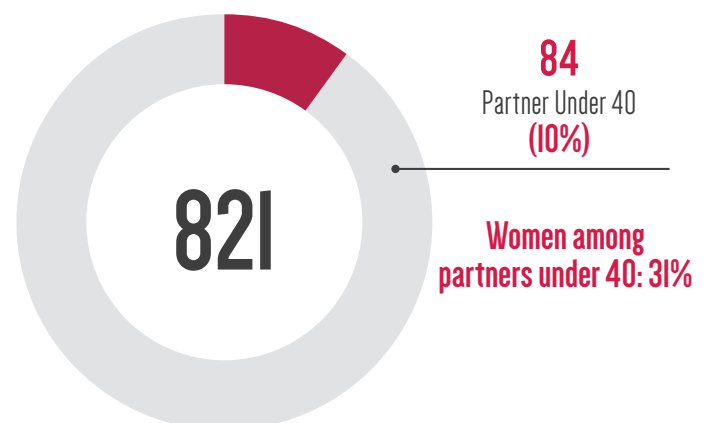

Taken together, the figures portray an Iberian legal market in which the under-40 generation is no longer simply an emerging cohort. With nearly two-thirds of the lawyers analysed under 40, younger professionals form a central part of the market's present structure and its future direction.

At the same time, the relatively smaller proportion of under-40 lawyers among partners — 10% — illustrates the distance between demographic representation and senior leadership. The coming years will therefore be critical in determining how effectively firms convert a large and increasingly experienced young talent pool into the next generation of partners and market leaders. This report examines that generation in greater detail: where under-40 lawyers are concentrated, which practice areas are attracting them, how gender representation evolves with seniority, and which firms are already seeing younger lawyers reach partnership. Together, these indicators provide a snapshot of a profession undergoing a significant generational transition — and of the lawyers who will increasingly shape the Iberian legal market in the years ahead.
